

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

An unstable, warm and humid airmass originating from the continent will cover the region today. In these situations, developments are very finely balanced as to whether heavy showers or thunderstorms will break out or not. Although many places may miss the worst, where thunderstorms do occur they could give locally torrential downpours.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Thu, 20th Jun 2013 until 23:55 on Thu, 20th Jun 2013

There is a low risk of isolated thunderstorms breaking out today across central and eastern England along with parts of east Wales, giving some intense downpours. These could give 15-25 mm of rain within an hour and 40 mm within 3 hours very locally. However many places could miss the worst of these.

The public should be aware of the risk of localised surface water flooding.

This is the an update to the warning issued yesterday to include most of the Midlands, Lincolnshire and parts of Yorkshire along with parts of east and central Wales
