

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

Clear skies and associated very cold continental air are returning westwards across England. In this airmass temperatures will drop well below zero in many places, causing partially melted snow to re-freeze. Cloud will increase again through the night across the southeast of England, bringing a renewed risk of light snow, especially over Kent, Sussex and the east of both Essex and Greater London. Amounts should be small but there is a low risk that a few locations will see an additional 2 or 3cm.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Ice

Valid from 13:00 on Tue, 07th Feb 2012 until 12:00 on Wed, 08th Feb 2012

As temperatures drop sharply this afternoon and this evening ice will form on untreated roads and pavements, specifically in those areas that still have a partially melted cover of snow. The public should be aware that there could as a result be some disruption to travel. In the far southeast of England an additional slight snowfall, up to about 1cm, is likely locally during the night.
