

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

A frontal system is expected to run into the UK from the west early on Wednesday, bringing further rainfall and strong winds. This will then sink southeastwards across the UK, clearing through Scotland by the early hours of Thursday and clearing northern England by the middle of Thursday.

There remains considerable uncertainty around the locations to be most affected by this system but further heavy rainfall looks likely across central and southern Scotland and northwest England. 20-40 mm of rain is expected widely across high ground and there is a very low likelihood of locally seeing 80-100 mm over the highest ground of these areas. Were this to occur renewed flooding is possible given the saturated ground and volume of water running through the river network.

Rainfall totals and further flooding of the level seen over the weekend are not expected.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Rain

Valid from 06:00 on Wed, 09th Dec 2015 until 09:00 on Thu, 10th Dec 2015

Further rainfall is expected to arrive across central and southern Scotland and northern England during the early hours of Wednesday before clearing to the southeast on Thursday.

Some very strong winds are also likely in association with this system with gusts of 60 mph possible around exposed coasts and hills. This could prove a further hazard.

Please be aware of the potential for further disruption from flooding and to transport. This
