

National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment

A shallow depression will remain slow-moving near, or over, southeast England for much of Monday. This will continue to bring heavy rainfall in many places, with totals of 20 to 40 mm quite widely and possibly exceeding 80 mm at a few locations within the amber warning area for the whole event. The more persistent rain may ease from the southeast during the day, although any brighter spells could allow scattered thunderstorms to develop in similar areas, most likely south of London, and potentially leading to rapid renewed onset of surface water flooding.

There remains some uncertainty about the exact areas which will catch the heaviest rain, and further updates may yet be issued.

The Met Office have issued an Amber Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Mon, 11th Jun 2012 until 23:55 on Mon, 11th Jun 2012

Rain, heavy at times will persist well into Monday, before gradually easing away westwards during the afternoon. Further thundery downpours are possible in the southeast later.

The public should be prepared for surface water flooding and localised river flooding, as well as very difficult driving conditions.

This warning has been updated to extend the Amber area slightly further west just fringing into the Bournemouth area. The Yellow area has also been extended further west
